

Highlights

- Researchers use statistical tests of stimulus or subjects characteristics to “control for confounds”
- This practice is conceptually misguided and pragmatically useless
- We discuss the problem and alternatives